Overdue Environmental Court Penalties

For the Years 2009 - 2014

BRITISH COLUMBIA

---

Introduction

Government administers a broad suite of regulatory requirements to protect human health and safety, as well as the environment. Environmental penalties are meant to deter harmful behaviours – especially those most harmful behaviours that are prosecuted through the courts. British Columbia takes a tough stance on unpaid environmental penalties by naming names in public reports, aiming to increase the collection of fines from businesses and individuals that break environmental laws.

This report, spanning the years 2009 to 2014, shows 5 businesses owing a total of $68,198 and 74 individuals owing a total of $152,380 in overdue environmental court penalties for a combined total of $220,578. The rate of collection for the court fine portion of the penalty is 91%.

The Ministries of Environment, Justice, Finance, and Forests Lands and Natural Resource Operations utilize a number of instruments to compel guilty parties to pay their fines. Those include: publication of names in this report, concerted action from debt collectors, cancellation of hunting and angling licences, seizure of bank accounts, liens on properties, and files referred to the Canada Revenue Agency for seizure of tax returns and GST payments.

Key Information

Court Fine vs. Court Order: Under environmental statutes, court penalties are comprised of a fine, and in some cases, a creative sentencing order. The courts typically direct funds from creative sentencing orders to specific organizations like the Habitat Conservation Trust Foundation, as per environmental legislation. Funds from creative sentencing orders typically finance projects that are aimed at mitigating or repairing the environmental damage caused by the non-compliant activity.

Payment data for the years 2009-2014 is current as of March 31, 2016.
