15 multiple-choice questions  Suggested Time: 35 minutes
Value: 20%

INSTRUCTIONS: Read the following selection, “Thomas King,” and answer the multiple-choice questions. For each question, select the best answer and record your choice on the Answer Sheet provided.

Thomas King
from Honour Song: A Tribute (1996)
by Barbara Hager

1 Thomas King came to Canada almost by accident. In 1980 he wanted to start a new life for himself and his nine-year-old son after the breakup of his marriage. An old friend from Alberta called to tell him about a teaching position at the University of Lethbridge. He said no at first, but several phone calls later, he found himself driving north from Utah to Alberta.

2 “We hit an incredible hailstorm on the way up, just before the Alberta border,” he recalls. “The hailstones were so big that we had to park the car under an overpass and wait it out.” It was a dramatic welcome to a country where King would eventually settle permanently. He now laughs at his son’s reaction to the intensity of the storm. “My son looked at me and said, ‘Just so we get this straight, Dad. This was your idea.’” Sixteen years later Thomas King, now a Canadian citizen, lives a world away from the sudden summer squalls and edge-of-the-planet vastness of the Alberta prairie that he called home for a decade.

3 It was while King was living in Alberta that he began to write and publish short fiction in literary magazines. His first novel, Medicine River, appeared in 1990, followed by the novel Green Grass, Running Water and a collection of short stories, One Good Story, That One, in 1993. Not that literature—and especially Native literature—was foreign to him before moving to Canada. For his Ph.D. dissertation at the University of Utah, he explored Native oral tradition and contemporary fiction, and currently he specializes in Native literature and creative writing as an associate professor at the University of Guelph.

4 Coyote holds a place in the oral tradition of the North American Plains similar to the role Raven plays in West Coast stories. The trickster characters in King’s fiction have been icons of his literary and cultural sensibilities since he was a young man. Today, however, Coyote runs loose in King’s poems and fiction almost as if the clever marauder had been waiting all these generations for a writer to come along and allow him to get back to his tricks.
One cannot read King’s fiction without laughing, but it isn’t just his loosely jointed plots and clutter of mythical and real characters that amuse. It is the way he convinces the reader of the absolute credibility of the people and animals who appear, often uninvited, into scenes, and how his stories have a way of slipping around in time and space to create a masterful blend of old and new oral traditions.

King was born in the United States in 1943, the son of a Cherokee father and a Greek mother. He spent most of his youth in California and completed a B.A. and M.A. in English at Chico State University. Although he has spent close to 15 years on the faculties of various universities, he describes himself as a better writer than teacher.

King continues to write fiction primarily. “My new novel is set in the northern Montana-Alberta landscape,” he says, then admits he is struggling with it. Nevertheless, he doesn’t attribute the difficulty to his new writing environment in overbuilt, highway-laced Southern Ontario.

The novel, Truth and Bright Water, is set on the U.S.–Canada border, and one of its central images is an unfinished bridge that crosses the river that separates two towns. “They’ve gotten halfway done and stopped it. You can’t use it to cross over with cars. You have to walk across. It’s like a skeletal bridge that looks like it’s trying to connect the two places, but can’t quite do it. The novel is named for the two communities—Truth is a white town on the American side, and Bright Water is a reserve town on the Canadian side.”

King acknowledges that the novel’s setting has a connection to his own life. Since the mid-1970s, he has roughly split his time between the United States and Canada, having lived in Utah, Alberta, Minnesota, and Ontario. And even though he is recognized as a significant Canadian writer, his works have gained a great deal of exposure in the United States. The New York Times Review of Books, Newsweek, and People have all featured King and reviewed his work.

Despite an explosion of Aboriginal writers and publishing in the past 10 years, King believes there are still relatively few Aboriginal novelists in Canada because many writers have opted for the extremely active theatre and film scenes in Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton, and Vancouver. “In Canada a lot of the energy has gone into drama. You have a lot of your most prominent writers working in drama—Tomson Highway, Daniel David Moses, Drew Hayden Taylor.” The residual effect, he maintains, is that there is also a strong Aboriginal community of actors and people in theatre.

“Poetry is strong, too,” he adds. “Daniel [David Moses] has been up for the Governor General’s Literary Award. And in prose there’s Basil Johnston, Lee Maracle, Ruby Slipperjack, Jeannette Armstrong, and Richard Wagamese, who’s just written his first novel.” In the United States, he points out, Aboriginal fiction writers had an earlier start. Scott Momaday’s House Made of Dawn served as a breakthrough novel in the 1960s, opening doors and encouraging other writers to follow.

Still, it isn’t every day that you find yourself swapping stories and anecdotes with one of Canada’s finest storytellers. But I am also aware that Thomas King has a novel to write, and I have taken up most of his afternoon. There is little chance, I realize, that he will share even one more story today without the intervention of Coyote himself.

My rental car is parked in the cul-de-sac, and as I sprint through the rain, I notice that the car’s deflated rear tire is half submerged in a puddle of rainwater.

“Coyote!” I curse under my breath as I kick the flat tire.

Coyote replies, grinning, “Just one more story…?”
1. What did the hailstorm represent in King’s life?
   A. It signaled a time of significant change.
   B. It warned him of the need to make careful choices.
   C. It suggested that Coyote was playing another trick.
   D. It symbolized the controversial nature of his writing.

2. Which phrase best describes the role Coyote plays in King’s works?
   A. his alter ego

   C. a guardian spirit
   D. a recurring character

3. According to the article, what is a distinguishing characteristic of King’s fiction?
   A. humour
   B. transformation
   C. natural settings
   D. cultural bridges

4. What is King’s explanation for the relatively small number of Aboriginal writers producing novels in Canada?
   A. Acting and film are more lucrative.
   B. Drama and poetry are more attractive.
   C. There are more career opportunities in the United States.
   D. There is a lack of Aboriginal literary tradition in Canada.

5. Which technique does the writer use to conclude the article?
   A. She employs an analogy.
   B. She asks a rhetorical question.
   C. She imitates King’s writing style.
   D. She includes an unresolved ending.

6. With reference to “Coyote Leaves the Res” (Figure 1), which quotation from the article would be the best alternative title?
   A. “Coyote holds a place in the oral tradition” (paragraph 4)
   B. “a masterful blend of old and new” (paragraph 5)
   C. “the intervention of Coyote himself” (paragraph 12)
   D. “Just one more story” (paragraph 15)

POETRY

INSTRUCTIONS: Read the following poem, “Sweet Corn,” and answer the multiple-choice questions. For each question, select the best answer and record your choice on the Answer Sheet provided.

Sweet Corn
by Peter Blue Cloud

the edge of autumn touches leaves and sharpens
the morning air
white breath the river speaks in tumbling, slowly tumbling rising mists of steam
a biting axe is a dog bark
a cracking rifle
antler
hollow ringing woods

a crow graws us welcome (imagined)
as we harvest sweet corn
the field her summer warmth still holds in deep, rich earth
we bend to,
as a running breeze begins
the shushing corn dance

of our tall sisters
and the sweet grace of their motion is the sacred ritual
of our people,
now, kneeling here upon a blanket
as rain taps lightly the windows, braiding the sister corn into circlets
to be dried for the season of cold,

30 at winter’s table
      may we all think upon
    the first green shoots
      those gone
and those to come.

7. In lines 8–12, how are the tools and animals primarily compared?

A. by their action
B. by their sound

8. Which word best fits the description of autumn (lines 1–12) in relation to the description of the harvest (lines 13–21)?

A. contrast
B. paradox
C. parallelism
D. extended metaphor

9. Which word best describes the activity in the last stanza (lines 30–35)?

A. feasting
B. praying
C. observing
D. harvesting
10. How are the ideas primarily presented throughout the poem?

   A. through imagery
   B. through memories
   C. through instruction
   D. through story telling

11. Which phrase best summarizes the speaker’s feelings throughout the poem?

   A. gratitude for the life cycle
   B. love for the dancing sisters
   C. anticipation of the coming meal
   D. fulfillment from the harvest work
INSTRUCTIONS: Read the following excerpt from “A Coyote Columbus Story,” and answer the multiple-choice questions. For each question, select the best answer and record your choice on the Answer Sheet provided.

A Coyote Columbus Story

by Thomas King

1 You know, Coyote came by my place the other day. She was going to a party\(^1\). She had her party hat and she had her party whistle and she had her party rattle.

2 I’m going to a party, she says.

3 Yes, I says, I can see that.

4 It is a party for Christopher Columbus, says Coyote. That is the one who found America. That is the one who found Indians\(^2\).

5 Boy, that Coyote is one silly Coyote. You got to watch out for her. Some of Coyote’s stories are covered with scraggy Coyote fur but all of Coyote’s stories are bent.

6 Christopher Columbus didn’t find America, I says. Christopher Columbus didn’t find Indians, either. You got a tail on that story.

7 Oh no, says Coyote. I read it in a book.

8 Must have been a Coyote book, I says.

9 No, no, no, no, says Coyote. It was a history book. Big red one. All about how Christopher Columbus sailed the ocean blue looking for America and the Indians.

10 Sit down, I says. Have some tea. We’re going to have to do this story right. We’re going to have to do this story now.

11 It was all Old Coyote’s fault, I tell Coyote, and here is how the story goes. Here is what really happened.

12 So.

13 Old Coyote loved to play ball, you know. She played ball all day and all night. She would throw the ball and she would hit the ball and she would run and catch the ball. But playing ball by herself was boring, so she sang a song and she danced a dance and she thought about playing ball and pretty soon along came some Indians. Old Coyote and the Indians became very good friends. You are sure a good friend, says those Indians. Yes, that’s true, says Old Coyote.

14 But, you know, whenever Old Coyote and the Indians played ball, Old Coyote always won. She always won because she made up the rules. That sneaky one made up the rules and she always won because she could do that.

1 party: a reference to Columbus Day, a day of celebration in the U.S.
2 Indian: First Peoples; “Indian” is not the preferred term That’s not fair, says the Indians. Friends don’t do that.

That’s the rules, says Old Coyote. Let’s play some more. Maybe you will win the next time. But they don’t.

You keep changing the rules, says those Indians.

No, no, no, no, says Old Coyote. You are mistaken. And then she changes the rules again.

So, after a while, those Indians find better things to do.

Some of them go fishing.

Some of them go shopping.

Some of them go to a movie.

Some of them go on a vacation.

Those Indians got better things to do than play ball with Old Coyote and those changing rules.

So, Old Coyote doesn’t have anyone to play with.

So, she has to play by herself.

So, she gets bored.

When Old Coyote gets bored, anything can happen. Stick around. Big trouble is coming, I can tell you that.

Well. That silly one sings a song and she dances a dance and she thinks about playing ball. But she’s thinking about changing those rules, too, and she doesn’t watch what she is making up out of her head. So pretty soon, she makes three ships.

Hmm, says Old Coyote, where did those ships come from?

And pretty soon, she makes some people on the beach with flags and funny-looking clothes and stuff.

Hooray, says Old Coyote. You are just in time for the ball game.

Hello, says one of the men in silly clothes and red hair all over his head. I am Christopher Columbus. I am sailing the ocean blue looking for China. Have you seen it?

Forget China, says Old Coyote. Let’s play ball.

It must be around here somewhere, says Christopher Columbus. I have a map.

Forget the map, says Old Coyote. I’ll bat first and I’ll tell you the rules as we go along.

But that Christopher Columbus and his friends don’t want to play ball. We got work to do, he says. We got to find China. We got to find things we can sell.

Yes, says those Columbus people, where is the gold?

Yes, they says, where is that silk cloth?

Yes, they says, where are those portable color televisions?

Yes, they says, where are those home computers?
Boy, says Old Coyote, and that one scratches her head. I must have sung that song wrong. Maybe I didn’t do the right dance. Maybe I thought too hard. These people I made have no manners. They act as if they have no relations.

And she is right. Christopher Columbus and his friends start jumping up and down in their funny clothes and they shout so loud that Coyote’s ears almost fall off.

We got to find China, says Christopher Columbus. We got to become rich. We got to become famous.
Do you think you can help us?

But all Old Coyote can think about is playing ball.

I’ll let you bat first, says Old Coyote.

No time for games, says Christopher Columbus.

I’ll let you make the rules, cries Old Coyote.

But those Columbus people don’t listen. They are too busy running around, peeking under rocks, looking in caves, sailing all over the place. Looking for China. Looking for stuff they can sell.

I got a monkey, says one.

I got a parrot, says another.

I got a fish, says a third.

I got a coconut, says a fourth.

That stuff isn’t worth poop, says Christopher Columbus. We can’t sell those things in Spain.
Look harder.

But all they find are monkeys and parrots and fish and coconuts. And when they tell Christopher Columbus, that one he squeezes his ears and he chews his nose and grinds his teeth. He grinds his teeth so hard, he gets a headache, and, then, he gets cranky.

And then he gets an idea.

Say, says Christopher Columbus. Maybe we could sell Indians.

Yes, says his friends, that’s a good idea. We could sell Indians, and they throw away their monkeys and parrots and fish and coconuts.

Wait a minute, says the Indians, that is not a good idea. That is a bad idea. That is a bad idea full of bad manners.

When Old Coyote hears this bad idea, she starts to laugh. Who would buy Indians, she says, and she laughs some more. She laughs so hard, she has to hold her nose on her face with both her hands.

But while that Old Coyote is laughing, Christopher Columbus grabs a big bunch of Indian men and Indian women and Indian children and locks them up in his ships.

When Old Coyote stops laughing and looks around, she sees that some of the Indians are missing.
Hey, she says, where are those Indians? Where are my friends?

I’m going to sell them in Spain, says Christopher Columbus. Somebody has to pay for this trip.
Sailing over the ocean blue isn’t cheap, you know.
But Old Coyote still thinks that Christopher Columbus is playing a trick. She thinks it is a joke. That is a good joke, she says, trying to make me think that you are going to sell my friends. And she starts to laugh again.

Grab some more Indians, says Christopher Columbus.

When Old Coyote sees Christopher Columbus grab some more Indians, she laughs even harder. What a good joke, she says. And she laughs some more. She does this four times and when she is done laughing, all the Indians are gone. And Christopher Columbus is gone and Christopher Columbus’s friends are gone, too.

Wait a minute, says Old Coyote. What happened to my friends? Where are my Indians? You got to bring them back. Who’s going to play ball with me?

But Christopher Columbus didn’t bring the Indians back and Old Coyote was real sorry she thought him up. She tried to take him back. But, you know, once you think things like that, you can’t take them back. So you have to be careful what you think.

So. That’s the end of the story.

Boy, says Coyote. That is one sad story.

Yes, I says. It’s sad alright. And things don’t get any better, I can tell you that.

What a very sad story, says Coyote. Poor Old Coyote didn’t have anyone to play ball with. That one must have been lonely. And Coyote begins to cry.

Stop crying, I says. Old Coyote is fine. Some blue jays come along after that and they play ball with her.

Oh, good, says Coyote. But what happened to the Indians? There was nothing in that red history book about Christopher Columbus and the Indians.

Christopher Columbus sold the Indians, I says, and that one became rich and famous.

Oh, good, says Coyote. I love a happy ending. And that one blows her party whistle and that one shakes her party rattle and that one puts her party hat back on her head. I better get going, she says, I’m going to be late for the party.

Okay, I says. Just remember how that story goes. Don’t go messing it up again. Have you got it straight, now?

You bet, says Coyote. But if Christopher Columbus didn’t find America and he didn’t find Indians, who found these things?

Those things were never lost, I says. Those things were always here. Those things are still here today.

By golly, I think you are right, says Coyote.

Don’t be thinking, I says. This world has enough problems already without a bunch of Coyote thoughts with tails and scraggy fur running around bumping into each other.

Boy, that’s the truth. I can tell you that.
