NVIT and Aboriginal centres team up on training for early childhood education

PENTICTON – Ten Aboriginal learners in the Okanagan region are on the path to becoming early childhood educators thanks to a community-based education and training partnership with the Nicola Valley Institute of Technology (NVIT).

The Ooknakane Friendship Centre and En'owkin Centre in Penticton are partnering with NVIT on the program, which is receiving funding in the amount of $101,302. The program consists of accredited early childhood education courses that will provide participants with the skills and education to enter into early childhood educator positions.

This program is one of five new partnerships worth a total of $1 million that are enabling Aboriginal people to get skills and education in their communities to prepare for jobs in B.C.'s growing economy.

The other communities and organizations that will benefit from the partnership program with public post-secondary institutions are Lhtako Dene Nation, Squamish Nation, Xenigwet'in First Nations and Osoyoos Indian Band.

This $1 million investment is in addition to the $6.4 million in joint federal and provincial government funding previously announced for 23 projects to create partnerships between public post-secondary institutions and local Aboriginal communities. These projects are expected to deliver education and training that ranges from academic upgrading to skilled qualifications to more than 440 Aboriginal people. Today's announcement builds on that investment, and will provide training for a further 105 participants in five communities.

Quotes:

Penticton MLA Dan Ashton on behalf of Advanced Education Minister Amrik Virk –

"These partnerships will help develop economic and learning opportunities for Aboriginal learners. The skills and education that participants will receive in this program will lead to opportunities in early childhood education, teaching the next generation of Aboriginal students."

Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada Minister Bernard Valcourt–

"Through investments in skills training and education, our government is taking concrete action to improve employment opportunities for Aboriginal individuals and create healthier Aboriginal communities. Greater participation of Aboriginal peoples in the economy will lead to prosperous, self-sufficient Aboriginal communities and a stronger Canada."

Employment and Social Development Canada Minister Jason Kenney–

“Canada’s long-term prosperity depends on the labour market participation of all Canadians, including underrepresented groups such as Aboriginal people. Our government is taking action to help Aboriginal people get the right skills and experience needed for available jobs, through initiatives such as the First Nations Job Fund, the Skills and Partnership Fund and the Aboriginal Skills and Employment Training Strategy.”

Background:

In April 2014, government introduced B.C.’s Skills for Jobs Blueprint and committed to continuing to provide funding for in-community delivery of skills and training programs that meet Aboriginal learners’ needs and help prepare them to enter B.C.’s labour market.

The funding is being provided through the Aboriginal Community-based Delivery Partnerships Program. This year, total funding for the program is up to $7.4 million, which includes $3 million from the Ministry of Advanced Education, and up to $4.4 million from the Government of Canada. Funding includes participant costs for programs to be delivered in First Nations communities.

The Aboriginal Community-Based Delivery Partnerships Program also delivers on commitments of the Aboriginal Post-secondary Education and Training Policy Framework and Action Plan: 2020 Vision for the Future, including:

- Improving partnerships between public post-secondary institutions and Aboriginal institutes and communities.
- Increasing the number of Aboriginal learners in rural and remote communities accessing post-secondary education and training programs.
